Wild Tasmanian devils may soon be a thing of the past if the scourge of Devil Facial Tumour Disease continues to ravage these native icons.

Gunns is a keen supporter of the 'Devil Island Project' which aims to save the devils from potential extinction.

The devils live in a protected, wild habitat known as 'Devil Island', away from other infected devils. Fourteen devils currently live in the enclosed island and it is hoped they will breed and increase the numbers of healthy devils over the next few years.

Gunns made a significant contribution to the building of the enclosure, donating funds and assisting in negotiations for building materials.

This is just one of many worthy community projects that Gunns supports each year.
